

Coping With Cancer

Cancer can give rise to various emotions, which may be difficult for you to cope with alone. It is important to realize that it is not the end of the world. It depends on the stage of presentation. If your disease is detected at an early stage, you can be cured. Even if it is not cured, modern treatment can definitely control it for years.

After you learn that you have cancer, you may first not like to believe it. There may be episodes of anger, shock or depression. Do not try to suppress your emotions. If you feel comfortable by talking it out to the closest of your friends, go ahead, but if you feel you should be left alone tell it to your friends and relatives politely.

There may be a feeling of anger, resentment, denial, blame, guilt, withdrawal, isolation etc. Do not try to suppress them. But there is no need to blame your self or anybody for it. Further, the experience of surgery, chemotherapy and radiotherapy may itself make you depressed or irritable. There is not a single way of coping with it but one thing is sure, the more optimistic you are about the whole thing, the better are the results of treatment. So do not just succumb—fight!
